In order to reduce the heavy load that a stone tower would have put on the main structure, the designer of the 800 year old Ramappa Temple manufactured an ingenious type of bricks which were so much lighter than the ordinary bricks that they floated on water. While the lower part of the temple is made of stone, the entire superstructure is of 'spongy', 'floating' bricks.

The spongy bricks, more porous and much lighter, were made of a balanced mixture of clay and sawdust burnt in a kiln, the sawdust rendering the bricks spongy. The weight of these bricks was about one-fourth to one-third of the conventional bricks of the same size - which considerably reduced the load of the tower on the main building and does ensured its stability. Homogenous mixing of the raw materials and uniform burning process helped maintain good porosity in the body of the bricks making them lighter yet stronger.

The profusely ornamental temple enshrining the image of Lord Shiva and situated in the small and obscure village of Palampet, 200 km northeast of Hyderabad was built in 1213 A.D. by Recherla Rudra, a General of the Kakatiya King Ganpatideva. Interestingly, the Ramappa Temple is popularly known not by the name of its deity or builder but in a rare gesture of appreciation, by the name of its designer, Ramappa.

2. What are the spongy bricks made of? 1
